ABSTRACT

The paper focuses on the issues concerning labour market reforms in India. The prevalent issue is the inflexibility in the labour market which has created difficulties for producers to adapt and respond to changes in the market and the production process. In the context of India, major labour regulations and their coverage have been discussed. The empirical evidence in the given literature suggests that employment protection does not necessarily result in unemployment and slower growth of the manufacturing sector.

Flexibility In Labour Market: Is There A Need In India

Parul Jain

Abstract:

The title was clear and well formulated. The abstract was complete and essential details were presented. The present study focused on the issues concerning labour market reforms in India. The prevalent issue is the inflexibility in the labour market which has created difficulties for producers to adapt and respond to changes in the market and the production process. In the context of India, major labour regulations and their coverage has been discussed.

Introduction:

Introduction was rationalizing. Labour market is a social institution which not only supports work and production, but also impacts the representation, social integration and the personal goals of its participants. Labour market reforms or labour market flexibility generally include relaxation of regulations and laws by the institution that regulates the labour market so as to adapt and respond to changes in the market and the production process.

Methodology:

Paper was conceptual and present data from secondary sources.

Reference to the Literature and Documentation:

The literature review was up-to-date. The number of references was appropriate and their selection was judicious. The review of the literature was well integrated.

Presentation of Results:

Results were organized in a way that is easy to understand. Results were presented effectively; the results were contextualized.

Conclusions:

The conclusions were clearly stated; key points stand out. Labour market in India is not rigid enough to reduce employment and feeds upon the profit of capitalists. Labour market reforms are premised on a denial of existing regulations, either directly or indirectly and hardly intends to respond to changing the production process.

Scientific Conduct:

There were no instances of plagiarism. Ideas and materials of others were correctly attributed.

Relevance:

The study was relevant to the mission of the journal or its audience. The study was worth doing.
