The Seven Factors That Can Lead Attaining Enlightenment

Ven. Nandacariya

ABSTRACT:

The problem statement was clear and well articulated There are several types of sentient beings in the world either visible or invisible mentioned in Buddhist literature. Among those beings, we can divide those beings into three from the Buddhist point of view: human beings, devas and Brahmas. Human beings can be classified into two; ordinary ones (puthujana) and noble persons (ariya). Buddhists believe that all living beings have been running in the circle of live so long as they have full of attachment called Kilesa, defilement in Pali.

INTRODUCTION:

The introduction provides a good, generalized background of the topic that quickly gives the reader an appreciation The Pali term that reflects gaining Enlightenment in Buddhist literature is 'Bodhipakkhiyadhamma'. The teachings of the Buddha are preserved in its original which is called 'Pali language' in Buddhist countries, especially Theravada Buddhist countries. The term should be defined first before giving any discussion about the topic. One of the Pali words gaining popularity in Buddhist community is 'Bodhi' which is used in Theravadins and Mahayanists wherever and whenever occasion arises.

The most important of all is the first factor, enlightenment of mindfulness because insight cannot arise without it. It is fundamental, main and most essential factor for awakening. There is no other way than the repetitive mindfulness practice. Its benefit would be understood as the sole condition for the protecting of clear vision and deliverance.
